AHA's Supportive Housing Programs provide at-risk populations – who are often homeless or soon-to-be homeless – with a stable housing arrangement that includes intensive case management and support services to address individual needs. At-risk populations include homeless individuals and families, people with physical, mental, or developmental disabilities, military veterans, families separated due to the lack of housing, youth aging out of foster care, and other target groups that need quality, affordable housing.

For AHA, Supportive Housing holds a meaningful place among the housing opportunities we make available to low-income families and individuals.
