Organizational records. -- 1938-2013 and undated. -- 15.00 Cubic feet (22 boxes including oversized)

Scope and Content

The collection consists of records and papers created by foundational Atlanta Housing leaders; records created during the organization of Atlanta Housing; and records created during key events in the history of the organization including: anniversaries; internal events, programs, and celebrations; public events and celebrations; photographs; art and portraits; and other artifacts of historical value.

HISTORICAL NOTE ON ATLANTA HOUSING'S EARLY HISTORY:

The Housing Authority of the City of Atlanta was formed May 18, 1938, by the Atlanta City Council. Its first board of commissioners met on June 11, 1938 chaired by Charles F. Palmer. Prior to the creation of Atlanta Housing (AH), Charles F. Palmer with Dr. John Hope formed an alliance to create the first federally subsidized public housing in the United States under President Roosevelt's New Deal: Techwood and University Homes. The primary purposes of Atlanta Housing were: to provide decent, safe and sanitary housing at a rent affordable to low income families, to provide an environment that would encourage residents' upward mobility, and to help eliminate slums and blight through urban renewal programs.

At the beginning of its operations, Atlanta Housing conducted surveys to determine the areas of most need of slum clearance, the rent amounts that the low income families could afford, and the sizes of families in need of sanitary and safe housing. The clearance sites selected by AH were the city's worst slum areas. 89 percent of the houses in the slum areas were built before 1915. 79 percent of the units lacked either an inside bathroom or inside running water or both. As a result, the agency proposed development of six public housing projects: Clark Howell Homes and State Capitol Homes for white families and John Hope Homes, Grady Homes, Eagan Homes, and Herndon Homes for black families. Construction of Clark Howell Homes and John Hope Homes began in the fall of 1939.

During World War II the focus of public housing shifted from low-income housing to housing for defense industry workers and war veterans. Atlanta, like most American cities, experienced a massive influx of civilian workers seeking jobs in defense industry, increasing the need for policies that addressed urban housing needs for these workers and their families. President Roosevelt appointed AH's founder, Charles F. Palmer, as the Defense Housing Coordinator. Palmer drafted new legislation introduced by Congressman Fritz Lanham of Texas called The Lanham Act and signed into law in October 1940. The legislation emphasized low cost and speed in construction of defense housing.

In 1943, AH signed an agreement with the War Housing Center, the National Housing Agency, and the Federal Public Housing Authority, the successor of USHA. Under the agreement, migrate war-workers qualifying under the local housing authority's regulations would be placed in Techwood and Clark Howell Home units. There were approximately 2800 Victory Gardens kept by tenants in the AH housing projects raising as much as $10,000 worth of food. Canning and preserving were taught since the opening of AH's housing projects and these efforts were intensified with AH supplying leaders to assist in food preservation. Tenant funds supported the Girl and Boy Scouts' wartime related activities. Nurseries were created to help project mothers employed in war work. At the end of the war, Atlanta Housing also operated temporary housing for war veterans in 1945 at the end of Grant Street in Atlanta's first ward.

2014.0004.10.2.12 "The Effects of Revitalization on Public Housing Residents: A Case Study of the Atlanta Housing Authority." Journal of the American Planning Association. Vol. 71 No. 4. -- Autumn 2005

Scope and Content

This research uses administrative data to examine the long-term socioeconomic status of households that relocated from public housing projects in Atlanta as a result of mixed-income revitalization. The research spans 7 years, covering the period before relocation and demolition had begun and ending after mixed-income redevelopment was completed. Residents who lived in three public housing projects that were revitalized are compared to a control group of residents who lived in three projects that were not revitalized, showing that mixed-income revitalization greatly accelerated the residential mobility of public housing residents and that households displaced by revitalization did not experience a statistically significant loss of housing assistance. Households that relocated by using vouchers or by moving to mixed-income revitalized communities experienced significant improvements in their socioeconomic status, and they moved to higher quality neighborhoods. Additionally, their long-run socioeconomic status was similar to the status of households who moved from housing projects voluntarily, i.e. not in response to a planned demolition. This is one of few empirical studies of the effects of HOPE VI revitalization on public housing residents, and its conclusions argue against the elimination of funding for HOPE VI as called for in the president's budget for 2006.
